I ended up reading Imperial Bedrooms and Ravelstein at the same time, not for the abstract effect it just happened that way. In Imperial Bedrooms I was up to the part where Clay is fucking Rain and promising her the part in his movie and everyone starts disappearing and he gets really paranoid and you don't know what's real anymore, it was a library book and at that point I passed out behind Südblock in Kotti from too much of [redacted]'s k and someone stole my backpack, so I had to order a new one from Amazon for the library.

I was on vacation so I started Ravelstein. A professor of political economy for whom Platonic and Socratic ideals transcend lifestyle. He is however passionate about his Lanvin blazers, hi-fi and espresso machine. With Chick he discusses the potential of individuals, how we're born undeveloped into an already more developed world, spending our lives trying to grasp the fully formed things around us. There's also Keynes' observations of the Armistice negotiations and the French question of what to do with the German gold. By then I was back home in Vienna. The IMF was backing out of debt negotiations with Greece, and no one knows whether to fear China's property or stock bubble.

Amazon delivered Imperial Bedrooms as Ravelstein is dying. His lover Nikki is keeping the global visitors from his deathbed as he slips away. Clay is warned by everyone to stay out of it so he rents two teens to rape at a rented house in the desert and at Julian's funeral he's invisible behind his state-of-the-art deadpan nihilism.
